» 9:30 AM - OPENING REMARKS: GETTING OUT OF CRUISE CONTROL

Cities that have developed and promoted complete, safe bicycle networks have made measurable progress in addressing modern challenges of population growth, congestion, climate change and rising levels of wealth inequality. While bicycling is far from being the primary solution, it is a cost-effective, time-tested, quickly implemented remedy that can be applied in any community. To date, efforts for increased bike mobility have achieved only limited positive results throughout the U.S. But - using a dynamic, accelerated approach - some U.S. cities are building momentum and unlocking dormant public support to quickly implement complete mobility networks and realize the benefits for everyone.

» 10:15 AM – PANEL DISCUSSION: ADAPTING TO THE SPEED OF MOBILITY

Great biking cities are widely recognized as great places to live and work. But achieving the outcomes of quickly building out a complete mobility network and getting more people on bikes requires engagement on two different levels: the city and the community. In the landscape of rapidly expanding micro-mobility options, declining funding for public transportation, and the pressures of macro-economic forces on the daily lives of people, biking and mobility networks must become part of a larger community narrative and process rather than the lead story.

» 1:15 PM – ACTION PLANNING: ACCELERATING OUR PROGRESS

Even with committed leadership and engaged community partners, cities struggle to prioritize programs and projects that yield the biggest results. There are many pathways forward to choose from, and it is often difficult to know which programs are appropriate for your community and where to invest limited time and resources. Fortunately, using the example of other U.S. cities we have an opportunity to consider our own efforts and create a plan to accelerate progress locally.
