HISTORY

Catalina Island Company (then Santa Catalina Island Company) was incorporated in 1894 by William, Joseph and Hancock Banning, whose father, Phineas, was one of Southern California's pioneering legends. The three brothers, who had purchased Catalina in 1892, placed the island and other assets into their new corporation, with the goal of making Avalon an exciting and sustainable resort destination.

Like previous owners of Catalina Island, including the founder of Avalon, George Shatto, the Bannings were relatively successful in their endeavors. Over the next two decades, they built roads, hotels and several tourist attractions, but a fire in 1915, which consumed half of Avalon's structures, including six hotels, brought their company to the brink.

The brothers attempted to rebuild, opening Hotel St. Catherine in 1918 in beautiful Descanso Canyon, but mounting debt forced them to sell a large number of shares of their company a year later to a real estate development firm. One of the investors in that firm was chewing gum magnate William Wrigley, Jr., who purchased his interest without ever having seen the island.

During their first visit to Catalina in 1919, William and his wife Ada Elizabeth, along with their son and daughter, stayed at Hotel St. Catherine. The beauty of the island so enchanted the Wrigleys, they became determined to make the island an enduring part of their family's legacy. Mr. Wrigley eventually gained full interest in the Santa Catalina Island Company and set about investing millions to build many of Catalina's most endearing tourist attractions, including the Catalina Chimes Tower, Bird Park and iconic Catalina Casino.

A consummate marketer, Wrigley was always looking to create publicity for Catalina. In 1921, he brought his beloved Chicago Cubs to Avalon, where they would hold spring training for the next 30 years. Wrigley also welcomed Hollywood to Catalina, which was often transformed into a backdrop for many movies of the 1920s and 30s, including "Mutiny on the Bounty," which won the Oscar for best picture in 1932. Eventually more than 500 movies, TV shows, documentaries and commercials have been film in and around the island over the years.

When William Wrigley Jr. died in 1932, ownership of the company transferred to his son Philip Knight Wrigley and daughter Dorothy Wrigley Offield. In 1972, the Wrigleys and Offields created the Santa Catalina Island Conservancy, then a private charitable foundation, and three years later deeded 88% of Catalina's interior and coastline to the foundation. The Santa Catalina Island Conservancy thrives to this day as a non-profit organization. Its mission is 'to be a responsible steward of its lands through a balance of conservation, recreation and education.'

Under the stewardship and guidance of third and fourth generation descendants of Ada and William Wrigley Jr., the Catalina Island Company continues to offer a complete resort destination experience, including hotels, restaurants, a spa, water sports, camping, and a host of land and sea tours, activities and adventures that showcase Catalina's culture, history, rugged wilderness and unique marine ecosystem.

CLIMATE Catalina boasts a temperate climate, with average annual temperatures between 54° and 75° F. Average annual rainfall is less than 13 inches. Ocean temperatures range from the low 50s in winter to the low 70s in summer.
