The Museo de las Americas showcases modern and traditional art from throughout the Americas. Art galleries like the Native American Trading Company and Artists on Santa Fe Gallery and Studios tempt visitors to take a little place of culture home with them.

Denver has long been a gathering place for people of all cultures. First were the high plains American Indians who followed the buffalo herds and lived throughout the Front Range. These included the Ute, Arapaho and Cheyenne tribes, which had their own distinct cultures. When prospectors discovered gold in 1858, thousands of people crossed the Great Plains and settled in and around Denver. More than a third of the cowboys riding the cattle drives of this era were African-Americans, many of them freed slaves who migrated westward after the Civil War.

In 1859, one of the most famous cowboys to ever put on a pair of stetsons made his first trip to Colorado. William F. "Buffalo Bill" Cody would later become a cultural icon in the Old West, famous for his exploits as a Pony Express rider, buffalo hunter, army scout and showman. Cody traveled all over the United States and Europe, but chose a gorgeous spot on Lookout Mountain in Golden as his final resting spot. Today, the place where he spent his life, the Rocky Mountains to the west and the Great Plains to the east. He died in 1917.

Asian immigrants worked on the railroads and many of them settled in Denver. Hispanic Americans have a long history in the region and their influence can be felt everywhere. Today, Denver is a city of many colors and cultures, a rich tapestry of diverse and fascinating people.
