Risks

Jumping into a body of near-freezing water is not an activity to be taken lightly, and in deciding to do so, you should understand the many risks of this activity can include:

1. Cold water will generate shock to your system. This may leave you gasping for air and unable to hold your breath. Blood vessels along your outer body will constrict, attempting to shift blood to your inner organs. Your muscles will get very cold and may become temporarily paralyzed or weak. Drowning is a very real risk if you are not careful.
2. A cold-water plunge may increase your risk of heart attack. For those at risk of stroke, aneurysm, blood pressure problems, or heart disease, the constricting of blood vessels and extra stress on your body can be especially dangerous. Even among healthy people, the adrenaline release that occurs during a polar plunge can lead to irregular heart rhythms.
3. A cold-water plunge may increase your risk of stroke. When temperatures decline, your blood pressure tends to go up, particularly in older persons. When you are cold, your arteries may constrict, which means your blood must be pumped with greater pressure in order to reach all areas of your body. The higher blood pressure is one of the largest risk factors for stroke. Exposure to such change in the cold temperatures may lead to a rise in your blood pressure that in turn, raises your stroke risk.

If you know you have high blood pressure, are at an increased risk of stroke, or are elderly, cold-water plunges may pose too much of a risk for you.

Even if you are healthy, you should prepare yourself for this cold-water plunge by immersing yourself on a regular basis, or "prime" your body for the plunge by taking gradually colder showers for a few days. This may help you develop a tolerance to cold water. It is also important to immerse yourself in the water gradually before you take the complete plunge, such as walking in as opposed to fully jumping in which leads to such a sudden change in your body temperature that may cause health problems.
