BROOK TROUT (Salvelinus fontinalis)

How to Identify

- Light spots on a dark background
- Some red or pink spots with blue halos concentrated on lower half of body
- Lower fins and tail striking white offset by black
- Distinguished from splake by square tail

Other Information

The brook trout is native to the eastern United States. It was introduced in the western United States from the late 1800s until around 1940 and is now found in Wyoming. The brook trout prefers clean, cold streams and has become well established in beaver ponds.

BROWN TROUT

(Salmo trutta)

How to Identify

- General lack of spots on the tail
- Light colored "halos" around the dark spots
- May have some red or orange spots
- Small scales and have light or brown background

Other Information

Though not a native of Wyoming, the brown trout is now widely distributed in lakes and streams throughout Wyoming. In streams, brown trout prefer dense cover, underneath banks and under vegetation.

CUTTHROAT TROUT

(Onchorhynchus clarkii)

How to Identify

- Body is bright, golden yellow with a brassy green back
- Large spots distributed uniformly on body and caudal fin, which can be rectangular in shape
- Few or no spots on head

Other Information

Cutthroat prefer small, clear streams and rivers along small to medium size lakes. Cutthroat are spring spawners. Cutthroat over 12 inches often feed on small fish and crayfish.

GOLDEN TROUT

(Oncorhynchus aguabonita)

How to Identify

- Uniquely vibrant markings, yellow gold to olive green tint on its sides and belly
- Two brilliant red stripes, one on its belly, the other on the lateral fin.

Other Information

The golden trout is a spring spawner. Hybridization with rainbow and cutthroat trout does occur, so management programs are designed to keep these species reproductively isolated whenever possible.

KOKANEE SALMON

(Onchorhynchus nerka)

How to Identify

- Silver during most of the year, but brilliant red during fall spawning
- 13 to 15 rays anal fin while trout have 9 to 11

Other Information

Kokanee are fall spawners. Various strains spawn from late August to early November. As with other Pacific salmon, Kokanee die following spawning. Kokanee generally average 12- 16 inches in Wyoming.

LAKE TROUT

(Salvelinus namaycush)

How to Identify

- Light-colored spots on a dark background
- Deeply forked tail

Other Information

Food of lake trout over 12 inches is predominantly fish. Trout, chubs, whitefish and Kokanee have been found in lake trout stomachs in Wyoming. The lake trout is an extremely long lived fish with fish over 20 years old reported. Lake trout are a fall spawner that spawn on rocky shoals in lakes.

RAINBOW TROUT

(Onchorhynchus mykiss)

How to Identify

- Uniform black spots
- White tips on fins

Other Information

The rainbow, like the cutthroat, is a spring spawner. Since these two species are fairly close relatives, hybridization often occurs. Rainbow prefer cool, clean water, either streams or lakes, with maximum water temperature below 70 degrees Fahrenheit. Rainbow trout in lakes eat plankton, insects, snails, crayfish and freshwater shrimp.

SPLAKE

(Salvelinus fontinalis x Salvelinus namaycush)

How to Identify

- Dark background with white spots, or pink spots
- Forked tail fin, although not as deeply forked as the lake trout
- Distinguish from Brook trout by forked tail

Other Information

Splake is a hybrid between a male brook trout and a female lake trout. Unlike many hybrid, the splake is not sterile. Splake are fertile and may reproduce in nature. They grow faster than either of the parent species.
