

Nebraska's Best Kept Crane Secret

Prairie Chicken Viewing

In the spring the hearts of the Nebraska Greater Prairie Chickens turn toward love. To successfully attract a female mate, the male Prairie Chickens must impress them with their dancing prowess. Males will gather in large numbers on dancing grounds known as leks. They will cackle, jump, and stomp their feet, sometimes scuffling with a rival.

The ladies will observe the shenanigans circumspectly, examining the prospects with a critical eye. However, if they see something they like, they may come forward for a brief, flurried assignation.

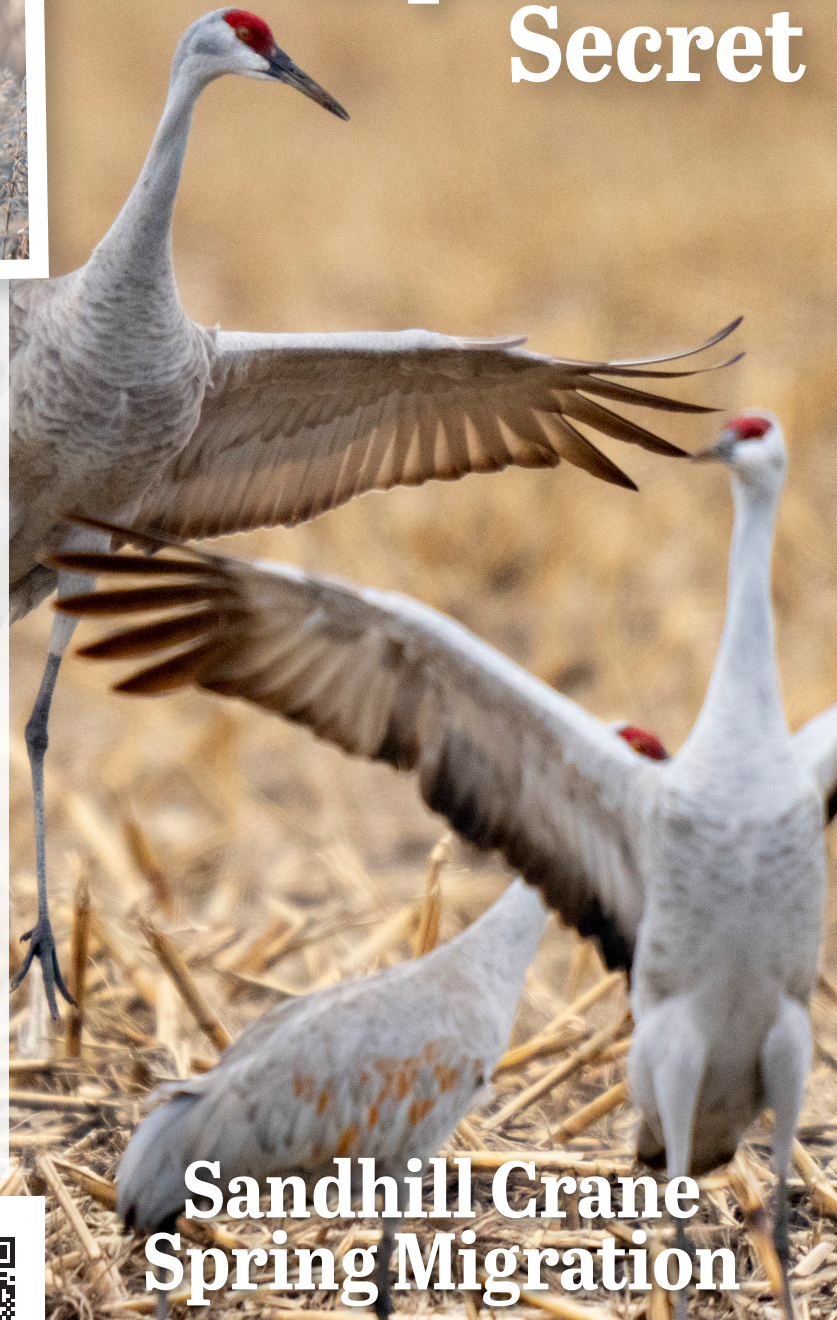

The dance of the Nebraska Greater Prairie Chicken can only be viewed at sunrise and is truly magical to watch.

Sandhill Crane Spring Migration

Each year over three hundred thousand Sandhill Cranes will spend six weeks in the Platte River Valley near North Platte on their way to their nesting grounds in Siberia. The Cranes will feed, loaf, and dance in the crop fields and meadows. The peak season of the Sandhill Crane migration in North Platte is typically the beginning of March through the beginning of April.

At sunrise and sunset the North Platte River is the perfect place to view the incredible concentrations of Sandhill Cranes as they come to strategically roost for the night, or as they awake and take off for another day of feeding and Dancing.

The spectacular Dance of the Sandhill Crane is something that can't be experienced in a viewing blind on the river. One of the best ways to watch the Dance of the Sandhill Crane is to use your car as a mobile viewing blind along the rural roads. The highlighted route on the map is all paved, but don't be shy about taking gravel roads to get an even better view. The best observing times are mid-morning to late afternoon.

Birding Etiquette

- Approaching birds will only cause them to fly away.
- Avoid loud noises or flashing lights. It is illegal and disrupts the birds.
- Do not stop on highways, driveways, or any other private farm road to watch wildlife.
- Respect private property. Do not trespass! Most land in the Platte River valley is private.
- Use your vehicle as a Viewing Blind to avoid disturbing the birds.
- If using a public blind for sunrise viewing you must arrive and move into place when it is still fully dark out. If using a public blind for sunset viewing you must arrive and move into place when it is still fully light out.
